After his retirement from baseball, Schott went into the real estate business. He founded the Long Schott Realty Company in Cincinnati, and he quickly became one of the most successful real estate developers in the city. He built thousands of homes and apartments, and he also developed several commercial properties. He was known for his philanthropy, and he donated millions of dollars to charities and educational institutions.

Schott was a larger-than-life figure, and he was known for his colorful personality and his love of baseball. He was a close friend of several presidents, including Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft, and he was a regular guest at the White House. He was also a close friend of many of the greatest baseball players of his era, including Ty Cobb, Honus Wagner, and Walter Johnson.

Schott died in Cincinnati in 1934, at the age of 72. He is buried in Spring Grove Cemetery in Cincinnati, and his墓碑 is inscribed with the following epitaph: "He built homes for dreams and baseball teams for dreams."

Building Homes

Schott was a pioneer in the development of affordable housing. He built thousands of homes for working-class families, and he was known for his innovative designs and his commitment to quality construction. He was also a strong advocate for fair housing, and he worked to break down the barriers that prevented African Americans and other minorities from owning homes.

One of Schott's most famous developments was the Longworth Homes subdivision in Cincinnati. Longworth Homes was a planned community that was designed to provide affordable housing for working-class families. The homes were well-built and affordable, and they featured modern amenities such as indoor plumbing and electricity. Longworth Homes was a huge success, and it helped to establish Schott as one of the leading real estate developers in the country.

Building Baseball Teams

In addition to his work in real estate, Schott was also a passionate supporter of baseball. He was a close friend of many of the greatest baseball players of his era, and he was a regular guest at the White House. He was also a strong advocate for the development of youth baseball programs, and he helped to found the Cincinnati Reds Youth Baseball Academy.

Schott's most lasting legacy in baseball may be his role in the development of the Cincinnati Reds. Schott was a key figure in the Reds' early success, and he helped to build the team into one of the most successful in the National League. He was also a strong advocate for the construction of a new stadium for the Reds, and he was instrumental in the development of Crosley Field. Crosley Field was one of the most beautiful and iconic stadiums in baseball, and it was home to the Reds for over 50 years.

A Lasting Legacy

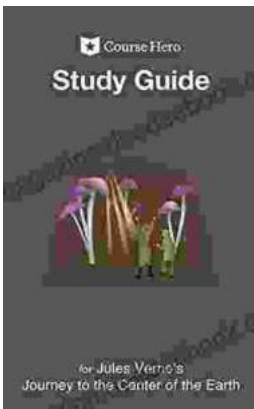

Long Schott was a legendary figure in the world of baseball and real estate. He built homes for dreams and baseball teams for dreams. He was a pioneer in the development of affordable housing, and he was a strong advocate for fair housing.
