Early Life and Obsession

Rosemary Graham was born in 1953 in Fort Sheridan, Illinois. From a young age, she exhibited signs of obsessive behavior and emotional instability. Her parents divorced when she was young, and she spent much of her childhood feeling isolated and alone.

In 1970, at the age of 16, Graham saw David Cassidy perform on the television show "The Partridge Family." She became instantly obsessed with the young singer, and her obsession soon spiraled out of control.

Graham began writing increasingly explicit and bizarre letters to Cassidy, expressing her love and desire for him. She also made numerous attempts to contact him in person, often showing up at his concerts and hotels.

Escalation of Harassment

As Graham's obsession intensified, her behavior became more aggressive and threatening. She began making phone calls to Cassidy's home and office, and she even sent him unsolicited nude photographs.

In 1974, Graham was arrested for trespassing on Cassidy's property. She was charged with disorderly conduct and given a restraining order against him. However, this did little to deter her.

Graham continued to stalk Cassidy relentlessly, even after he married in 1977. She would often follow him on tour and show up at his concerts, hoping to catch a glimpse of him.

Mental Health Struggles

As Graham's obsession with Cassidy became all-consuming, her mental health deteriorated rapidly. She began to experience delusions, believing that she and Cassidy had a secret connection and that he was secretly in love with her.

Graham's family and friends became increasingly concerned about her well-being, but their attempts to help were met with resistance. She refused to seek professional help and continued to live in denial about her condition.
