The riders were led by a Polish cavalry officer named Kazimierz Piechowski. Piechowski had served in the Polish army during World War I and was a skilled horseman. He had also been a member of the Polish Olympic equestrian team.

The other riders in the group were Stanisław Stańczyk, another Polish cavalry officer; Konstanty Lewandowski, a Polish veterinarian; and three Mongolian riders: Gelegdorj Purevjargal, Dorjgotov Bandi, and Jamsrangiin Purevjargal.

The riders' journey began in Warsaw, Poland. They traveled through the Soviet Union, Mongolia, China, and Afghanistan. They crossed mountains, deserts, and steppes. They faced extreme weather conditions and dangerous animals. But they never gave up.

The riders' journey came to an end in Paris, France. They had traveled for more than two years and had covered more than 10,000 miles. Their journey is a testament to the endurance and courage of both horses and humans.

The Horses

The horses that the riders used were Mongolian horses. Mongolian horses are known for their endurance and hardiness. They are able to travel long distances in difficult conditions.

The riders had a total of 12 horses that they used on their journey. Each rider had two or three horses that they rode and a fourth horse that they used to carry supplies.

The horses were well-cared for by the riders. They were fed a diet of grass, hay, and oats. They were also given water and salt on a regular basis.

The horses performed admirably on the journey. They were able to travel long distances in difficult conditions. They also showed great courage and determination.
